Images of the police violently arresting a man

Once again, white riots have erupted across the UK; these supremacist uprisings were fanned by the agitators who glorified police officers kicking a prone man in the head back in April.

Now, however, the shoe is on the other skull:

Was the way to get the right to care about police brutality just showing them when it happens to white people all along? <https://t.co/wCpegp6PJm>

Police do not protect people

To make something clear up front, weâ??ve always opposed police brutality, regardless of who the victims are. And this is far from the first time police officers have brutalised white Britons, as weâ??ve reported:

- A woman tried to protect others from police violence. Today she was sentenced to prison
- Shocking footage reveals ongoing police violence against protesters â?? and how they joke about it
- Woman was â??terrifiedâ?? during arrest at Sarah Everard vigil

Weâ??ve also reported on instances of police violence against people of colour. A recent example of this was the arrest of Essa Suleiman. As we reported at the time:

On Wednesday 29 April, Essa Suleiman allegedly stabbed three men — two Jewish and one Muslim, in Golders Green. At the time of the attack, Suleiman was living in supported housing having previously been detained in a secure hospital. Suleiman has a history of mental illness, and was referred to Prevent in the past.

The initial response was to label the incident an “antisemitic terror attack”, with the government raising the threat level in response. In light of the above information coming out, however, these moves would later seem to be premature.

At the time, we argued that regardless of the situation, the police shouldn’t have kicked a prone and tasered suspect in the skull

Training should give police officers the skills and courage they need to detain a suspect without resorting to what could be prosecuted as assault with a deadly weapon. For whatever reason, that training did not take with these officers.

And when we made this argument, it responded as follows:

The left are already claiming “excessive force” was used on the terrorist.

They can go f*ck themselves.

The “Inevitable West” account is now retweeting stuff like this:

Truly shameless. And other accounts are making similar arguments in response to separate incidents:

The police threw a protestor so hard into a metal pole that it bent (pictures in the comments). He is now hospitalised.

Surrounded by a dozen or so officers, this is the only way you could detain him?

Belfast police violently arrest local man and woman.

If they were a Somalian knifeman would they have been beaten like this?

 All these incidents have occurred in recent days.

One reported death, a 5 year old kid & young boy severely injured/impaled.

The UK Police want you to see how they will treat you for putting a single foot out of line (but only if youâ??re White that is) !!â?!

Oblivious

Regardless of your political persuasion, thereâ??s a good reason why you should want police officers to face consequences for using excessive violence. That reason is thereâ??s nothing to stop them committing violence against you once they have the free pass.

As ever, we didnâ??t have to wait long before the rancid right had this message beaten into them.
