Andrew

Buckingham Palace had emails six years ago showing the queen's second son, Andrew, was abusing his position as UK trade envoy. It was a position the late queen had pressured the government into giving the Epstein pal formerly known as Prince Andrew.

Court documents have revealed that the family had an archive of information since 2020 concerning Mountbatten-Windsor's sharing of information with banking scion Jonathan Rowland. Andrew had told his serial child-rapist friend Jeffrey Epstein that Rowland's "shady" banker father David was his "main money man". Emails released in the US Justice Department's Epstein files show Andrew, as trade envoy, trying to promote the Rowlands' businesses to Epstein.

Andrew - The bus isn't big enough

The palace is again trying to distance itself from Andrew's dodgy dealings, claiming that it could not comment because he is the subject of a police investigation. Thames Valley Police has appealed for people to provide it with information after Mountbatten-Windsor's arrest for suspected misconduct in public office

The king has already shown a readiness to throw his brother under a bus to protect the monarchy. However, Charles is known to have forked out huge amounts of money to fund Andrew's legal battles over Epstein. Rowland, for his part, has confirmed that emails relevant to Andrew's disclosure of sensitive information were among the archive provided to the Palace as part of disclosure in a 2020 legal case.

The case did not directly involve the royals but they received the emails because many mentioned, or were sent to/by Mountbatten-Windsor. He is not the only Epstein-linked figure known to have passed sensitive and highly lucrative information obtained in a government role to contacts. Other Epstein files show Peter Mandelson, at the time an adviser to the Brown government, repeatedly passing insider-trading information to Epstein himself Mandelson was later appointed as UK ambassador to the US by Keir Starmer, despite the Starmer regime's knowledge of Mandelson's actions and links to Epstein
